Re: People v. McMann – 18-006367-FH – DVD-based discovery material

Dear Mr. McMann:

You'll recall that you have successfully petitioned the Circuit Court to be allowed to represent yourself in the referenced case. You'll also recall that I have been appointed "standby counsel," though I did not seek that appointment.

You'll also recall that I have transmitted to you copies of all the discovery materials, pleadings, orders, etc. that I had on file, with one exception: the physical DVD containing the sole disclosed video recording of the alleged incident. This would be the video that I played for you several times, and that we discussed in detail, during one of our several video-teleconference meetings.

I inquired at the jail about how to transmit the DVD to you by a method or in a format that would allow you to use the video to prepare your case for trial. The jail's clerks referred me to Lt. Smith; I called him, and he returned my call late last week.

Lt. Smith advised that the DVD will be placed with your personal property when I transmit it (an event that I anticipate will happen when I'm there later today. But Lt. Smith also advised that the jail will not make facilities available for you to view that DVD, unless you obtain an order from the Court. I protested that decision, to no avail.

Now that you're directing your own defense, I recommend that you apply to the Circuit Court for relief, so that you can have meaningful access to the video evidence that probably will be admitted against you at trial.

Sincerely,

Lance C. Hendrickson
